Ready, set, launch! What makes a collection roll-out successful?

Our exclusive feature, we explore in detail what it takes to successfully launch a jewellery collection.

By Harshini Mahawar · 6th February 2026

The jewellery market is always growing, and is projected to be worth around $310 billion in 2025, according to Market Research Future.

It is slated to grow at a compound annual growth rate of 4.7% between 2026 and 2035 to reach $480 billion, and there will be almost 2.5 billion millennials in the world by 2035. With this information alone, there is no such recipe for brands to be releasing new collections in a market with this amount of growing potential.

Many jewellery brands will be very familiar with the process of launching new developing and launching a new collection.

This is, of course, an exciting process, but it doesn't come without a lot of work. Despite the fact that launching a collection is a fun and creative process, the process of launching a new collection's success is rarely determined by how good the designs are alone.

From strategic timing and pricing to storytelling, marketing and visitor engagement, how a collection is marketed and launched can be just as important as the pieces themselves.

The jewellery industry is a competitive one, and there are many factors that can determine whether a collection succeeds or not. Jewellery drives by how much value a piece offers to the customer, and how well the brand can tell the value and how the materials are sourced. Brands can also differentiate by price.

A 1.5k wide survey conducted by Statista found that 41% of consumers in the UK and US would be willing to pay more for jewellery, with 60% of those surveyed under the age of 25 saying that they would be willing to pay more.

With this in mind, brands and retailers often look to launch collections around key moments, like holidays, anniversaries or evening-wear showers – from concept to launch, a collection can take months, and it can maximise the impact it has on these brand moments.

Timing is crucial to a jewellery collection's success, as a collection deserves an arguably great launch.

Ideas generation

All collections must begin with an idea. This is the stage where brands and designers research their customers to build on their brand and their values.

For jewellery designer Karina Choudhry, this is the stage where she looks at her own life and her own experiences, as these are the memories that stay with her, and things she has seen in her own life. She also looks at a constant source of inspiration for her. It is a constant source of inspiration for her. It is also the one original piece she has kept from the very "Choudhry eyes.

She also gives an example that inspiration can also come from everyday life, including the way that people interact with their jewellery, and how they wear it.

Packaging and displays together Gatsbyesque, which is a collection that was inspired by the glamour and drama of the roaring 20s.

Refining the initial concept

With any creative work, the initial idea for a collection's beginning with a simple mood board, which some designers call a "vibe board".

When working on an in-depth collection, like the Gatsbyesque collection for Karina Choyce, the storytelling is everything. "It's about creating a narrative around the piece," she explains.

"It's a more about elements or specific inspirations that I've had in my own life and I place it onto a large mood board. This is where everything begins.

The idea is then refined by a small team and defined, oftentimes on in-house or external design team, and this is where the initial sketches and the capabilities of the suitable materials are explored. Designers will also look at the practicality of the collection and the piece, and this is often done by engaging with the production team to make sure that the collection is realistic.

Wherein for Gatsby, the starting point for the collection was the brand's own heritage and tradition and modernity in which connections to the Art Deco movement of the 1920s and 30s. Also the original home for the brand of precision goldsmithing, combined with a love of bold geometry and luxurious detail, the collection is fine jewellery – the backdrop to what is trending in the wider jewellery market, and the consumer behaviour that goes with the communication department.

Choudhry's brand's strategy is planned around the launch of the collection, and this is where everything begins.

"We don't just create beautiful objects, we create pieces filled with emotions, memories and stories," she explains. "Gatsbyesque is a collection that celebrates glamour, romance and coherent design language."

For Gatsby, this was a "powerful cultural moment, symbolising a time of liberation and transformation, and this is where the brand's roots and the capabilities of the suitable materials are explored. Designers will also look at the practicality of the collection and the piece, and this is often done by engaging with the production team to make sure that the collection is realistic.

Choudhry's brand's strategy is planned around the launch of the collection, and this is where everything begins.

"We don't just create beautiful objects, we create pieces filled with emotions, memories and stories," she explains. "Gatsbyesque is a collection that celebrates glamour, romance and coherent design language."

For Gatsby, this was a "powerful cultural moment, symbolising a time of liberation and transformation, and this is where the brand's roots and the capabilities of the suitable materials are explored. Designers will also look at the practicality of the collection and the piece, and this is often done by engaging with the production team to make sure that the collection is realistic.

Karina Choudhry says the fashion industry is also a huge source of inspiration for her, and how people might expect." when when the collection is refined and the design is developed further. It is also where the technical details are finalised.

Additionally, this stage becomes a collaborative one, as the designers work closely with the technical team to ensure that the collection is wearable, durable and manufacturable.

"A successful launch, for me, is one where the collection is received with clarity and it's given a long look," Choudhry describes.

Launch strategy

Once the collection is refined, it's time to launch, with some starting on this earlier stage than others.

Choudhry's launch strategy is established around the collection's narrative, and this is where the brand's visual identity is developed as well as the collection's marketing plan.

Choudhry's launch strategy is established around the collection's narrative, and this is where the brand's visual identity is developed as well as the collection's marketing plan.

"It's a more about elements or specific inspirations that I've had in my own life and I place it onto a large mood board. This is where everything begins.

The idea is then refined by a small team and defined, oftentimes on in-house or external design team, and this is where everything begins.

Karina Choudhry says the fashion industry is also a huge source of inspiration for her, and how people might expect." when when the collection is refined and the design is developed further. It is also where the technical details are finalised.

Additionally, this stage becomes a collaborative one, as the designers work closely with the technical team to ensure that the collection is wearable, durable and manufacturable.

"A successful launch, for me, is one where the collection is received with clarity and it's given a long look," Choudhry describes.

Launch strategy

Once the collection is refined, it's time to launch, with some starting on this earlier stage than others